Sourcing list

DIY CNC epoxy-granite mill · October 2026

Parts to buy for the machine in `model/DIYCNC.FCStd` / `docs/report.txt`, sourced on Amazon (US) where it makes sense. Prices and stock were checked on 2026-10-09. "?" means the price was not visible (Amazon blocks automated page reads); check the live listing. Shipping and tax are not included. Off-Amazon picks are marked "not Amazon": they are there because Amazon doesn't carry the part or is much dearer. Rows marked (opt) are optional and are left out of the totals.

The same list is in `docs/sourcing.csv` for a spreadsheet.

Totals

Section	Priced	Unpriced items
Motion and drives	$522.50	0
Spindle and electronics	$367.78	14
Castings and frame	$1,317.36	0
Enclosure, coolant and covers	$573.92	3
Total	$2,781.56	17

The unpriced items are mostly the 120 V VFD, the electrical parts, the ACM sheet, the sump pump and the spiral cover. My rough estimate for them is another $450-750 (not checked), so the build comes to roughly $3.2-3.5k before shipping.

Where the money goes: the frame section: casting materials ~$360, aluminium plate ~$240, steel tube and plate ~$245, rods and fasteners ~$190, risers ~$110. Then the enclosure and coolant ($574), the spindle and VFD, and the closed-loop motors ($162).

Cheapest places to cut: buy the tube, top-plate steel and risers from a local steel yard (offcuts or full lengths you cut yourself; estimated ~$100-150 less than the listings here) and skip the flood coolant and enclosure at first (~$550, see the README cost section); AliExpress versions of the rails, ballscrews, spindle and VFD (often 30-50 % less, slower shipping). Retail cut-to-size shops (e.g. Metal Supermarkets) were checked and cost more than these listings, about $820 for the tube, risers and aluminium.

JLCMC and JLCCNC (checked 2026-10-10). JLCMC list prices are about half of Amazon for rails and couplings (e.g. the Y rail pair $27.40), but US orders prepay a 55 % duty plus DHL shipping, so the whole motion order comes to about $250-300 against about $190 here. There is no ready-made SFU1204 (lead 4) kit, and the 1605 screw-end machining for BK12/BF12 is not confirmed. Worth adding the rails and couplers only to a JLC order you are placing anyway.

JLCCNC machining of the three aluminium plates with all holes is estimated at $430-850 delivered (90 % duty prepaid on machined aluminium) against $242 for blanks you drill yourself: only worth it for the X carriage if you want its hole pattern exact. JLC 3D printing of the mould parts costs several hundred dollars against $60-90 of PETG.

Check before ordering

1. Couplers. Both ballscrew kits ship with 6.35 mm-bore couplers; your motors have 8 mm shafts. Also check your owned open-loop motor's shaft and current.
2. VFD on 120 V. No real 2.2 kW drive takes 120 V and outputs 220 V; the step-up drives stop at 1.5 kW. The spindle runs at up to ~1.5 kW now and gets its full 2.2 kW when you switch to the kit's 220 V VFD on 240 V. Use a dedicated 20 A circuit.
3. No cutting. Rails, ballscrews and tube are used at the lengths they are sold in; the risers, plates and top plates are ordered cut to size. Only the M12 threaded rod is cut (hacksaw).
4. Tubes and rebar. Buy plain (black) steel, not galvanized: epoxy bonds poorly to zinc. Wire-brush off rust and loose scale, degrease just before casting. Stock-length tube is +/-1/8 in on length, with an internal weld seam: file the seam where the spigots and printed sleeves go. 0.120 in wall (11 ga) works as well as 1/8 in.
5. Imperial sizes. The plates and risers are already inch sizes in the model. The 3/8 in top plates are 0.5 mm thinner than the modelled 10 mm, which doesn't matter.
6. Low stock. Several picks showed "only N left", including the closed-loop kits.
